

Christmas is Coming

By: Ella Vandenberg

For years there has been an ongoing debate about when people should start celebrating the holiday season. Some argue that the holiday season should not start until after Thanksgiving while others are already pulling out their Christmas decorations as early as October. While there are still those that hold out 'till December, the growing social media presence and trendiness of holidays like Christmas have aided in starting the celebration earlier each year.

For those who do like to get into the holiday spirit extra early, there are various streaming services and networks that will help you do just that. Holiday movies grow in popularity each year. While the classics like "White Christmas" and "Home Alone" remain relevant, each year there is another slate of movies released.

For years television networks such as Hallmark have participated in the classic Countdown to Christmas in which they have dozens of holiday movies premiering weekly as the holidays approach. This year is no different, with over 40 new movies and programs set to be released throughout the season. This year, however, the movies will premiere earlier than ever, with a start date of Oct. 18. This will be perfect for all those who like to get an early start to the holiday season.

Although one can still enjoy the classic Hallmark movies, many competitive networks are also joining the popular holiday genre. One of the most notable is Netflix. This year Netflix will be releasing four original holiday movies starting in November. The streaming service has accumulated many notable names to star in the specials including Pentatonix and "Mean Girls" actress Lindsay Lohan. These movies will premiere throughout the holiday season and join the already large lineup available on the service.

For everyone ready to get into the holiday spirit, the wait is almost over. With all the holiday content soon coming to various streaming platforms, the holiday season is sure to be an eventful one. Whenever you are ready to start celebrating, you are sure to have enough content to carry you through the holidays and beyond.

